

From:

Subject:

Date:

Intellectual Property

Thursday, March 18, 2010 3:03:54 PM

I think the complexity of the problem with intellectual property was brought to light when Napster was shut down and the world switched to another P2P program that did the same thing. To fight P2P sharing programs, I would recommend promoting as much intellectual property on them as possible that is infected with some "wipe your computer" virus. This would ward off down-loaders eventually.

Fighting crime that happens over the internet will never be effective without some sort of international court for cybercrime. Until that happens, taking away bits and pieces of rights away from the Bill of Rights is a bad idea. I would rather see your organization catch no-one then to reduce the Bill of Rights in any way.